NEAR DEATH.

AN ALMOST FATAL PLUNGE.

Will Henry Experiences a Hair Breadth Escape.

Last Saturday afternoon while Will Henry was assisting Harry Snook to draw the posts which ordinarily hold the flash boards (which had all been drawn because of the flood) on the south of water works dam, he turned with his back to the upper water, and, in some way slipping or falling, was thrown into the water above the dam.

When Mr. Henry saw that he could not escape falling, he gave a spring, hoping to get above the current of the dam, but was not successful in doing so, and was drawn over the dam by the powerful suction of the falling water.

In going over Mr. Henry must have struck his head, as he was partially unconscious when he appeared in the eddy below the dam.

Mr. Snook waded out as far as he could and extended a pole to the drowning man, who was whirling around the eddy free downward, with both hands over his face. When Mr. H. felt the pole strike him, he still retained consciousness enough to grasp it, and was drawn to the shore.

When brought out of the water, he was unconscious, and artificial respiration had to be resorted to, to bring him back. At the present writing Mr. Henry is all right, only a little the worse for fear.
